This question will be asked to the public by both the media and politicians on a nearly daily basis. Further, in light of events in Ukraine, and the personal foibles of politicians on both sides of the aisle, the question will be asked quite frequently in the next two or three months. This question will be asked with an eye on the Mid-term elections on 6 November. I will concede from the start that the US is a superpower and can afford to expend time and energy in a manner which may not be ideal for the citizens of Syria, a relatively small country of only twenty five million people. I think that there are few, if any, countries in the world which can respond in kind to a US military intervention. Almost all major powers and their allies will be constrained in some way. So, I will also contend that the ultimate effect on international security will not be all that significant. And, if it is just another demonstration to the world of American military might, that the US can "do" anything, then we have a problem with a militarized world order. And, we have such a problem because too many people think we have a military that is too big for our own good. The Syria question is a matter of "Do you really want to know?" So here is the real question. If you don't want to know, then don't read any further. If you really want to know, then read on. Here is the question: If a government is killing its own people, perhaps by way of food or weapons ban, or through war related interference in medical treatments, or through a general quagmire of war, then you have to ask yourself: How does it threaten the national security interests of the US? If you can't answer that question, then you are not asking the right question. Is the killing of people the US is fighting in Syria going to affect the military or government of Syria in any significant way? If not, then it really is not a question of US national security, and might not be 09e8f5149f

Tweak visuals and select sections The keyboard can be dragged across the desktop to any suitable position. Resizing is also possible, but this is only done progressively, meaning you can't adjust just the height or width. Moreover, it does not snap to edges of the screen, so careful positioning needs to be manually performed. All the way over to the settings panel you get the chance to change the visual style, and behavior options. Visual customization only consists of a transparency slider for the keyboard, and a custom color apart from the default one. Keyboard sections can be toggled on or off through simple mouse selection. Additionally, you can have the keyboard automatically show up when specific programs are running.
